BACKGROUND

Agriculture and industry go hand-in-hand with each other. The development of agriculture from 1st Industrial revolution to 4th has been enormous. Industrial and agricultural revolution has taken place up to the present-day giving ideas and considerations for the future. The fourth industrial revolution is an advanced digital technology, focusing on opportunities that could change the environment in the way humans think and work. The fourth industrial revolution concept combines artificial intelligence and big data that have achieved significant attention and popularity in precision farming like in monitoring, diagnosing insect pests, measuring soil moisture, diagnosing harvest time and monitoring crop health status and reducing complicated monitoring by human. However, there are specific challenges faced by agriculture along with the farming supply chain to permit the operative implementation of Industry 4.0 guidelines. In fact, the revolution in agriculture is still limited to a few innovative firms. Despite the advantage of industry or agriculture 4.0 for large enterprises, small and medium enterprises still face complications in such innovative processes due to the continuous development in innovations and technologies. Policy needs to be made for supporting the SMES to invest on these technologies and making them more competitive.
